African American Membership in Religious Confraternities at Holy Trinity

by Peter J. Albert

The Black community's participation in Holy Trinity parish life throughout the 19th century is abundantly evident in our archive of sacramental records. It is reflected, too, in documentation of Black contributions to the parish, both material and financial, and in their requests for the offering of Masses. And we see it in the records of Black involvement in religious confraternities at Holy Trinity – called by one historian “one of the best indications of both a commitment to the parish and to Catholicism.”

The earliest of these societies, for which we have records, was the Confraternity of the Rosary, established at Holy Trinity in 1822. Members agreed to meditate on the Rosary, make personal devotions, and gather on Sundays to recite the Rosary. The Confraternity lapsed after 1840, although unsuccessful attempts were made later to revive it in 1867 as the Living Rosary Society, and again in 1875 as the Confraternity of the Rosary.

The names of the Confraternity's members, recorded in a ledger, were initially intended to be separated by race, with entries for Whites recorded at the front of the book and those for African Americans at the back – so the front cover was stamped with the word “Rosary,” and the back cover with the words “Rosary. Coloured People.”

Within a page or two of the beginning of the ledger, however – probably still during the 1820s and probably for the convenience of the writer – entries naming White and Black members of the Confraternity began to be mixed together on the same page, with the names of African Americans often indicated by the abbreviations “col” or “col'd.”

Between 1822 and 1840, the Rosary Confraternity's ledger named 139 Black members – about a third of its membership. For reasons that are now not clear to us, however, the reorganized Confraternity after the Civil War recorded far fewer Black members – only four in 1867, and 26 in 1875.

Ongoing pew rentals by Black parishioners during the nineteenth century suggest that the number of Black parishioners was not substantially declining at that time at Holy Trinity, so that would not account for the fall in confraternity membership. Perhaps, over time, those writing names in the ledger were less likely to note race. We see this in the case of another confraternity, the Scapular Society.

Entries in the ledger of Holy Trinity’s Scapular Society span the period from 1829 to 1868. Here again, as with the Rosary Confraternity, the names of the members were intermixed racially. The ledger includes the names of 148 parishioners designated as African American with the abbreviations “col” or “col’d” but other African Americans, designated as such in the ledgers of other parish confraternities, are not so designated in this ledger.

A third confraternity, the Cent Society, was organized in 1834. Subscribers agreed to pay a penny a week to be used for “ornamenting the Holy Altar, Tabernacle, Sanctuary & Church, & to promoting the Solemnity of Divine Worship.” The names of contributors were recorded in a ledger, and a Mass was offered “for all the Members of the Society, living & dead, at least once a month, on a Sunday.” The ledger was “placed on the Altar during that Mass, because it contains the Names of all the Members of the Cent Society.”

No fewer than 212 Black men and women were listed as contributors to the Cent Society in 1834. In this ledger, Black men and women were listed in columns separate from each other and separate from those for White men and women. The names of White men and women often carried titles – for example, Miss Mary Fenwick, Mrs. Mary Ann Fearson, Mr. Patrick Gorman – but the names of Black members were seldom distinguished in this way. When the Cent

Society was revived in 1865, 77 members were listed as African Americans – again, far fewer than in the 1830s.

Altogether, Black participation in these three societies at Holy Trinity spanned half a century, from the 1820s to the 1870s, and included hundreds of members. The names recorded in the ledgers of these three confraternities provide us with an invaluable resource for documenting Black membership in the parish and participation in parish activities. The ongoing commitment we see reflected in these ledgers underscores the importance for Black parishioners of their life of faith and their involvement in Holy Trinity’s parish community. ✝

THE FEAST OF ST. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA

Monday July 31st is the feast day of St. Ignatius of Loyola, founder of the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits).

As a Jesuit-sponsored parish, we invite you to explore, encounter, and engage a 450-year-old tradition that is Ignatian spirituality.

Through his own experience of exploring the big questions of life (of meaning, connection, and how to live), St. Ignatius of Loyola wrote the Spiritual Exercises. He desired “to help souls” discover who they are in God’s heart and grow in interior freedom to love all God’s people as God loves them.

Individuals who try to live a spirituality drawn from the Spiritual Exercises seek to find God in the most mundane and mysterious events of daily life. They try to be faithful to a regular prayer practice, make choices using Spirit-led discernment and listen deeply for how God is inviting them to be in solidarity with their brothers and sisters.

To celebrate Ignatius’ feastday, we invite you to... Explore: the autobiography of Ignatius Loyola (a terrific new translation is The Pilgrim’s Testament by Father Bart Geger, SJ), or a film that leads to self-discovery. Encounter: a personal relationship with Jesus Christ through the full Spiritual Exercises, or in a retreat in daily life. Engage: a faith that does justice by being in friendship with individuals who are living on the margins of society or freely give what you have received through one of our lay formation programs.
